Overview

This online workshop will provide an introduction to presenting research outputs in English-language venues. It will cover all of the key elements: the basics of presenting, the layout and content of a presentation, and producing an abstract.

About the workshop leader

The seminar leader, Dr Russell Ó Ríagáin, is currently conducting a postdoctoral research project at University College Dublin, funded by the Irish Research Council. Prior to this, he was a researcher at the Department of Geography, Queen's University Belfast. A graduate of the National University of Ireland, Galway (BA in history and archaeology; diploma in Irish), University College Dublin (higher diploma in sociology), and the University of Cambridge (MPhil and PhD in archaeology), he has taught at the University of Cambridge, Tsinghua University (Beijing), University of Heidelberg, and University of Bremen. An experienced academic with over a dozen publications, over thirty conference presentations and nine conferences organised, he is also a very experienced academic editor, having served as editor-in-chief of two journals (Archaeological Review from Cambridge and Human Figurations), managing editor for one journal (Journal of Transcultural Studies) and two book series, and has worked as a freelance academic copy editor for over twenty years on 26 books and almost 200 articles, ranging from medicine and molecular biology to economics, sociology and literature.

Requirements for participation

Please bring a 300-word abstract for a conference paper based on your own research, written in English and formatted according to the Chicago Manual of Style, Seventeenth Edition. Any form of English orthography may be used (i.e. US English, UK English) so long as it is consistently adhered to throughout. Scholars from all fields of research are welcome, as the workshop is applicable to all disciplines. A level of English according to CEFRL C1 and above will be assumed for the participants.
